

ABSTRACT

Spherical, transparent silica gel particles with a high luminescence that are produced through the encapsulation of one or more different luminescent substances in a silica gel matrix. By varying the concentration of the luminescent substances and through the encapsulation of substances with different emission frequencies, the particles can be used as multiplex coding and marker systems in bioanalytics and diagnostics.